

Blast off!
By Hanna Fryman

If I had a technology time capsule, it wouldn't be fancy just a wooden box. I would put my name, the date, the time, and the place. My time capsule would have about three things in it: my I pod touch, a digital camera, and play station I chose to put in my I pod in because maybe he/she likes music. Or maybe they just might think it's cool and rare.

The camera I would put in for a few reasons only: 1) so if they liked nature they would like to use something different than usual, 2) because it could be rare and worth some money for them. And 3) maybe they don't know what it is and use it.

The Play Station is in there because they probably like games and so I'd give them a game to play that they might have never played before. So they can play it like us. I would also like to let them know how much it could be worth, and how rare it is right now.

I would bury it in Casper, Wyoming. "Why you ask". Because it really is a special View if I put it in a big open field next to a small stream. Hopefully a young kid comes along and trips over it. And picks it up to see a time capsule that has all this awkward stuff in it that they've never saw before and thought it was pretty cool and tries to play with the stuff and it doesn't work until he/she looks at the directions. I will be happy to know that the person in another two hundred years from now will take care of my stuff and play with it a lot or cash it in for money. Either way, I'm happy if they are too. But if they're bad people and don't take care of my stuff I will be saddened. From this and they may do one so I just might come along and do the same.
