I'm excited that I was just appointed the new Technology Coordinator for the President of the United States. My first project is to implement a new system to allow for lightning fast communication through the government and even to the American people.

My new system has several parts. First there is a secret secure database which connects the President, his staff, all of the government officials, and even the American people together. It's kind of complex, but basically it allows you to quickly generate a list of people to send information. Next is an internet-based social networking site like Facebook, only its called myCountry.com. All of the government officials use it to talk to each other. When you combine it with my secret database, you can send stuff to just the right people in a hurry. A third part of the solution is the video messaging. I think it's easier to talk to people than having to write everything. With this piece, you can record a video message. The last part of the system is the use of cell phones to get the messages. Most everyone carries a cell phone with them, so it works great for receiving the video messages.

I got to try the system out the other day when we received word that there was a cure for the I8BUGS flu. This flu has been infecting the whole country and it has really started to hurt the economy. Well, the cure for the I8BUGS flu is to eat a cherry tootsie pop. I had the President record a message to the American people telling them to eat a cherry tootsie pop. The message flew through my system and out to everyone in America! By the end of the week, the I8BUGS flu was cured!
