

Jacob Fults Hi9

3/04/2009

I had finally accepted the reality that I was working for the President of the United States. When I interviewed for the position, I never thought I really had a chance for the job. I was waiting outside his office when he approached me. I stood up and shook his hand firmly, "Good morning Mr. President. I've got some new technology gear that I am excited to introduce to you." The President smiled at me with confidence and requested that I walk with him to the technology lab where my gear was transported to earlier. Working for the President requires all items to be thoroughly checked prior to him seeing them.

As we walked into the lab, I approached the work table with all my inventions. The first item I presented to him is called Skitel Glasses. I actually came up with the name as I was eating a bag of skittles and removed a couple letters and Skitel glasses were born. "These glasses, Mr. President, are none that you have ever seen before. As you can see, they look exactly like your reading glasses that you wear. When you put the glasses on you can tell if someone is speaking the truth or not. The lenses are sensitive to body temperature. When the person is lying, you will see a red glow around their body. If there's no red glow, then they are telling the truth." The President seems pleased with the glasses' abilities.

The other item I showed him looked like a simple cell phone. The uniqueness of this phone is its ability to transport the President to a designated safe place if there's a threat of danger. There are four designated places that the President agreed to that will transport him to a safe place. Of course, I cannot tell you what they are, since only his top secret agents know the exact locations. The President turned to me saying "Young man, these are by far the greatest inventions I have ever witnessed. I am looking forward to all your future inventions." He turned to walk out of the lab and said to me, "Keep up the good work".